OTHER CHARACTERISTICS

Supervision and guidelines available

Most assignments are determined by the natural flow of the work and are performed without specific instruction. Work methods are expected to follow standard practices except when unusual or difficult cases occur, when more specific instructions may be given.

Responsibility for independent judgment and decisions

Individuals are guided in their tasks by prior experience, manuals, office directives, and supervision. They function within these guidelines, utilizing independent judgment in routine assignments.

Originality of thinking required

Originality is required in choosing among several predetermined alternative courses of action based on general instruction or precedents and in recognizing cases that will require the establishment of new policy or procedures. Employees may also be expected to exercise a critical approach to their regular routines and make occasional suggestions for improvement.

Contacts

Because of the technical nature of the tasks present and the measure of concentration necessary for efficient performance, contact with the public is at a minimum. The greater number of contacts are on the inter-or intra-departmental level concerning problems of work flow and distribution.

Supervision exercised

Typically there is no direct line supervision over others, although employees may frequently assist in training new employees or act in a lead capacity over others performing similar work.
